Stocks have continued their strong performance. We think the performance of U.S. stocks may make the asset class a great total return option, but the income has continued to erode as stocks rise.

The general slowdown in bond purchases by international policymakers coupled with a weaker dollar make international stocks more attractive. A weaker carry grade in June indicates it could be time to rotate some asset classes.

Emerging market stocks still produce low income, but the asset class offers strong diversification away from the U.S. economic environment. We think the strong trend, valuation and possible change in the long-term cycle all favor this asset class.

We think the positive correlation of this asset class with bonds should be taken seriously, especially for any portfolio with a large position in fixed-rate bonds. We see the rebound off recent lows, along with the increased carry, as an improving opportunity for income.

The declining trend and increasing volatility are the hallmarks of a weak market. We see energy-related stocks as some of the best bargains in the market today, but we would like to see volatility come down.

We see preferred stocks as the asset class to own for safe U.S.-based income. It does have a positive correlation to bonds, but the higher income stream should help protect it from changes in rates. Plus, as bank stocks rallied, the bank-heavy preferred market declined. The asset class has continued to improve on a relative performance basis.

Utilities

Like real estate, utilities sold off as investors weighed the impact from the June rate increase. We see this as an attractive opportunity to get low volatility U.S.-based income especially if a rotation toward safety continues.

Recently, we think this asset class has become more attractive. The high volatility of the asset class has improved and could provide a good source of income.

If emerging market stocks are too volatile, we believe this asset class is a great way to access to the economic growth of the emerging markets with some decent income and lower volatility. Additionally, most of these stocks are backed with hard assets and positive cash flow.
